PREFACE

WITH the publication of the second revised edition of GRANGER'S INDEX TO POETRY AND RECITATIONS, it is gratifying to acknowledge the ever-increasing demand which the book enjoys. New uses for GRANGER are constantly being discovered—the radio, in particular, by opening up a new field for poetry and prose recitation has created a new demand for such indexing and special lists as GRANGER provides.

This increasing usefulness of GRANGER'S INDEX is reflected in its increased size. The first edition of GRANGER'S INDEX, published in 1904, was the outgrowth of requests for certain poems made to the poetry department of McClurg's retail book store. It listed 30,000 titles. The present volume, with approximately 75,000 title entries, is therefore more than twice the size of the first GRANGER and approximately one-half larger than the 1918 edition.

This edition indexes current anthologies including those of 1937 which have appeared since the publication of GRANGER'S SUPPLEMENT in 1928. Anthologies in the 1918 INDEX and 1928 SUPPLEMENT which are still in print are also contained in this volume. There are, however, books included in the earlier editions of GRANGER and doubtless on the shelves of many libraries, which are not included in this edition. Many librarians will, therefore, wish to retain the earlier editions of GRANGER for reference.

In addition to anthologies, the INDEX includes thirty-five volumes containing poems of fourteen of the best-known contemporary poets. After consultation with a number of librarians, these poets were chosen on the basis of popular demand. When available, complete or collected editions were used; when not, poems were indexed from separate volumes. In the Appendix there are also twenty-two books listed by symbol only under special subjects.

It is not claimed that the INDEX lists all poems and recitations extant, but few popular ones will be sought in vain. Others, useful to study clubs, teachers, and students of all ages, are also indexed. It has been the endeavor to trace selections to their source when means were available and to identify properly poems which, though identical, are listed by anthologists under a variety of titles. A much larger proportion than ever before of the anthologies selected are university and high-school texts, a fact which gives the student greater assurance of authoritative versions of ballads and poems.

In using the new GRANGER, the following changes and additions may be noted:

Writers have been listed under best-known writing names, as far as could be ascertained, with cross-references from other names under which they appear or might conceivably be sought. The names of married women are given main entry in the Author's Index under the writing-name; not, as formerly, under the married name. Pseudonyms are enclosed in quotations, as are all initials used as signatures, whether recognized pseudonyms or not.

Sonnets have been very carefully listed, because sonnets chosen from sequences are being increasingly included as separate poems in anthologies, often without reference to the fact that they come from such sequences. Therefore, all first lines of sonnets have been given in the First Line Index, whether they were originally complete units or parts of longer works. It is hoped that such listing will be useful.

In indexing long poems, great care has been taken to list selections so that it will be easily apparent not only in what anthology each appears, but also just what part (chapter, stanza, etc.) each represents of the larger work.

Limericks have been handled a little differently, perhaps, from the usual method. Since most limericks are best known by first line, and since it was found that the titles under which limericks appear in anthologies are often group titles and of no practical use in recognizing the limerick, all separate limericks have been referred by first lines to "Limericks" in the Title Index, and these other titles given as alternates. It was felt that not only was this the most satisfactory method, but also that grouping all limericks in one place might prove a valuable feature to those in search of such verse.

In the Title Index, a title which is either ambiguous ("Another Title") or a group title ("Lyrics and Epigrams") has been subordinated as an alternate to a title under which the poem might possibly be looked for, if such a title appears in another book. Otherwise it has been subordinated to its own first line.

The Appendix has been increased by the addition of lists of poems and recitations for a number of special days and subjects not included in previous editions. Of particular interest to teachers and students as well as librarians is Choral Reading, a new subject. Over a hundred and seventy selections, as well as special books, are listed under this heading.

Although every care has been exercised to eliminate errors, in a work of this kind some will inevitably be found. Exact information correcting them will be much appreciated and will be utilized in future editions of the INDEX.

Acknowledgment is made to all who have assisted in this revision, to the librarians who answered our requests for information, and in particular to the Chicago Public Library, whose Reference Department has given freely of its time and facilities.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

The TITLE INDEX is the principal index, and all references in the AUTHOR and FIRST LINE indices as well as in the APPENDIX apply to it. A Key to Symbols has been provided, so arranged that the library numbers of the books can be inserted after the symbols.

In explanation of the arrangement of the TITLE INDEX, it is only necessary to say that a title indented under the main entry is either the same poem or recitation under a different title or an abridgment or selection therefrom.

Such titles as "Lullaby," "Song," "Sonnet," etc., have been alphabetized by the first lines, which are given to assist in classification.

Titles and first lines beginning with "O" and "Oh" have been filed as though all were spelled "O" and alphabetized according to the second word. The spelling given ("O" or "Oh") represents the way in which the selections appear in a majority of the anthologies.

In the AUTHOR INDEX, "Mac" and "Mc" are filed as though all were spelled "Mac."

In this edition of GRANGER which, for the first time, lists the complete works of some poets, sonnets which are not included in any anthology and which are to be found only in the author's separate works are indicated by the word "Complete" in parentheses in the FIRST LINE INDEX following the title reference.
